SPECTRE

OF INGLETON; OR THE

FOREST MYSTERY

By Christine H. Carpenter

Into this he laid the deep-hued bundle, and ejeced the opening.

"Ha! ha!" he cried—"you are safe now. rould have burned the cursed things, but for Bear I should be caught, and then again, they may be needed once more; after that, it wouldn't make much difference if this old building was to burn down, accide tally of course, some night in the future. The first trick is taken—'tis mine! he is out of the way, the rest is clear the must be very late, five minu'es to tweive, by my watch! A peculiar hour for a man to be at night in a reported haunted house! I never seen a ghost in it yet, but then I have never before been here at this fatal hour. I'll be off." The listener drew back as he heard the las sentence, and re'reated within the room he had occupied. He had just time to softly shut the door, when the other passed, and began to des.

"Now," mused be, "why may I not keep up the reputation given this house? It must be

He stepped to the bankster, and bissed, in an altered voice, "Murderer!" and followed it with a wid "ba! ha! ba!"

Its effect was fearful upon him for whom i was intended; the candle dropped from his grasp, and, wildly terrified, he fled from the tenement. "That will keep him hence, for a while. I think my suspicions were correct. I'll see

Drawing a match from his pooket, and groping around, he soon found and lit his lantern, and hastened to the edjacent apartment, where proceeding directly to the mantle he began the search for the hidden pannel. It was a long time ere be succeeded in opening it; but he proved the ancient adage-"Perseverance is commendable," and had the satisfaction to behold the desired pickage. Piacing the lantern in a convenien situation, he untied the string around it, and unrolling it, found it was -a sust of clothes covered with dark stains! They consisted of a pair of drab pants, brown coat and vest; the latter was completely covered with the aforementioned stains, and after examining them closely, the stranger mur mured deeply-

"This is BLOOD! Ah, I have you now! The murderer is found!" And tying up the bundle as he had found it, he replaced them upon the shelf, closed the panel, and taking up the light, returned to the other room.

The victim of the ruse, when he had left the house some distance behind him, looked back to where it loomed up sgainst the starlit sky. "What a fright it gave me," he muttered. "I haven't got over it yet-how my heart beats! Can it be true, the tale that has been circulated about it. I have been in that place three different times, beside to night, and never have heard or seen the least evidence of the spirit so much talked about, if any one had to d me of such a thing, I wouldn't have believed it; but the evidence of my own ears-can I doubt that? Ah! a thought! Might it not have been the wind, whistling through the crevices; the house is old, and full of chinks; but the wind would not say-Murderer! Murderer? Ugh! I must be

Thus concluding, he hurried on, and soon reached his boarding-house, situated in the heart of the village; he crept softly in doers, and hastened to his own room, without arousing the inmates. His sleep was troubled that night, ever and anon, he wou'd start up, in fancy hearing again, that fearful word and mocking laugh. The workings of a guilty conscience, are as the sting of the corpion's bice, there is no escaping the righteous punishment inflected upon the sin-

Through the long weary watches of the night, though the other senses may be locked in slumber, the troubled conscience knows no rest; in dresms it exerts its power, stronger, even than

CHAPTER IV.

NELSON BRADFORD. SUNSET. "Nobody dies, but somebody's g ad of it"-Pro-

Feelings of awe are ever awakened in the heart, while gazing upon the dead. The frailness of mortality, is written upon the cold brow of the deed, in letters too plain to be doubted. The eyes once sparkling with life, the features aglow with health; in one short hour, stiff and marble like, in the embrace of the destroying angel.

We gaze upon the child, transplanted from its earthly home, to a more heavenly sphere, a smile upon its lips, the last workings of the soul, before its flight, sometimes with a sigh of regret, some-times with a quint joy, that the troubles of the world can never much it, but when we behold the man, strong in his own God-given powers, treading the paths of life with a firm, unyielding step, when he is stricken down, in his prime, we can but say-How strange, uncertain a thing is life! How strange, but certain a thing is

These, were some of the feelings that filled the mind of Mrs. Cranliffe, as she stood alone beside the comm, which contained, as abe supposed, the mortal remains of her husband. She trembled, guilty as she was, before the calm, but awe inpiring face of the corpse, she covered her face with her hands, for a moment, but the next ropped them, muttering:

Away with remorse! I'li no more of it." And with a determined air she turned away to leave the room, but she remembered that she had left the face uncovered, and hastening back, she was arranging the gauze curtain, when bending over, small round case slipped from the bosom of her dress. She picked it up, with a slight exclama-tion, and as she did so, the smiling face of a man Gazing at it for an instant, all the passions i her breast, seemed aroused. widow no doubt. You shall have this hand! Before I became the weal by Mrs. Cranliffe, you and me; but som! I know you, but you are safe yet awhile. The first trick of my game is

"Curse your amiles!" and she flung the case at her feet, and was about to trample upon it, when her expression changed, she picked it up, replaced b in her dross, and muttered in a low, chuckling

She left the room, which was the central parlor, the sofin stood in the middle of the apart ment, hung with a black velvet pall. 'Twas the fifth day from the morning the body had been discovered, search had been made in vain for the municipal, the traces of him could be found, the rais helps overflowed the path, as to obliterate all marks of factories or horsehook, thus destroying all due of purpoing the assausin. The whole affect was wrapt to mystery; nothing had been could not be marked arm, by porters were in them, in the tenset coat pocket, had been and upon the other features, an expression of months a handlesself bearing the initials "G. G."

Elle wa'ch was upon his person, all these were was not often assumed in a good cause, but more generally in some scheme to benefit himself, in some more sinister purpose, than the mere motive

The jury had rendered a verdic! of-"Murdere by the hand of some person or persons unknown to the jury"—and the body had been conveyed in its coffin to Cranliffe Hall, his supposed late dwelling, to be borne thence to the last earthly home—the grave.

Harry and Colonel Peeling had engaged rooms at the village inn, notwithstanding Mrs. Cranliffe's apparent reluctance to permit them to depart, but in a few words Henry informed her, that they would not willingly intrude upon her grief, and had concluded to change their quar-

They had been closely watching the actions of Julia, she had not been seen in company with that man, since the evening of their visit to the Central Clump.

Two o'clock had been the hour set for the Ceneral, and at that time the neighbors began to arrive, to take their last look upon their respected friend. The black servants had all been permitted to see their dead master, and were now collected in the hall, weeping and wailing as was the custom of their race.

Chloe, the housekeeper, was preaching a lesson to Jim, the coachman, about the "instaplebil'ty of human 'fairs."

'Jim, our dear massa am gone; took wident : minit's warnin'. Oh, hadn't ve poor sinners ort to trembil in our shoes, when we tink ob it. I'm older'n you ar Jim, an' I ort to know."

"Yes, Chloe, I know dats a fac, sartin; but here comes marse Harry, an' de Cunnel dar, an' dere is Marse Bradford, too. Now, Aunt Chlos, I dun hate dat pusson."

"You Jim, thar, 'sh, you dan know nuffin bout dat man, let Missus kotch you sayin'

At this moment, the solemn tones of the village minister, reading the service for the dead, smote upon their ears and they relapsed into silence. The coffin cocupied the same place, the middle of the central parlor, at its head was the pastor, his bands raised in prayer, his silver hair falling upon his shoulders, a ha'o round his aged face, at its foot, sat Mrs. Cranliffe in deep mouraing garments, her snowy kerchies, with its broad black border, concealing her features.

Her attitude was one of profound grief, and many were the remarks circulated, concerning the deep love she had borne her husband. Near her, stood Harry, and the Colonel; the former with his lustrous dark eyes, bent upon the widow; the attention of the latter, engaged with a tail individual, standing in an obscure corner, his countenance completely concealed in his cloak There was something familiar in his form, which riveted the gaze of Pesling, until he was startled by the voice of the minister.

"The friends of the deceased, will take their final farewell of his remains." He drew near the coffin, and looked in upo the corpse. "I never"-thought he to himself,-"saw two persons, more resembling each other, than this one and George Cranliffe!"

And it was indeed true, for not one, of all those who gazed upon the dead, but what would have sworn, it was George Cranliffe. Even Julia was leceived, the severe contusion before mentioned, adding to this, and the wife, after bending a moment over the face, lef: the room.

The Colonel drew back, and glanced toward where he had seen the tall figure, but it was gone, nor did he again see him, and as he noted this, a strange suspic'on possessed his mind. Mrs. Cranliffe did not accompany the deceased to the grave, her over-excited nerves, it was said, had relaxed, and she was unable to leave

As Harry Cranliffe stood by the narrow excavation, watching the body being lowered into it, he felt a slight touch upon his shoulder, and turning, beheld a dark looking man, who whis-"Is it possible, Harry Cranliffe, you do no know me? Surely you have seen my face often enough to recognise it—but grief makes misanthropists of us all, and I suppore you feel angry with human beings in general."

"Not so, Bradford!" replied Harry, forcing himself to accept the proffered hand. "I am neither a misanthropist, nor angry with my fellow creatures. I assure you, death is hard to but such a death!" he continued, go searchingly upon the other, who, without the slightest show of agitation, returned. "It is a heavy misfortune. To die, and to live, are peculiar things for mortals to comprehend. But when once our allotted time is at an end, and we approach the termination of our earthly account, 'tis sweet to be allowe i at least time to reconcile ourselves to our destiny; but to be cut down in the prime of life, without an instant's warning, is a fearful, fearful doom."

"What! can this man really be playing a part?" questioned Harry of himself, in perplex-ity, as he listened to these remarks. "If so, he is the veriest hypocrite the world contains." He gazed attentively at his features, but all was apparently calmness and compassion.

"Bradford!" exclaimed he, "have you, I ask in confidence, the slightest suspicion as to who committed this murder?"

This question was evidently unexpected to Bradford, for the muscles of his mouth quivered violently, and it was only by a strong effort that he controlled himself sufficiently to answer,

"Why, what a question! Really you have mbarrassed me. Suspect any one? Way, am the last man in the universe addicted to sus pecting, and I really knew of no one whom I even imagine could commit the deed. But do you suspect any one?"

"I can tell nothing about it, many mysterious courrences have taken place in the past, which will be unveiled in the future. Depend upon it'
—he continued—"whoever committed this deed shall know no rest! Think not there is no conscience, worms of earth. No, no, no! You, Belson Bradford, who were educated like myself, upon good Christian principles, know that there is! Is it not so ?"

"Really, Harry, you are vehement. Of course there is a conscience—whoever doubted it ?"

"I knew of one man who did, when meditating upon the committing of a cold blooded murder; but my friend be found out, after the commission of the deed, that no matter when or where he was, he knew no rest. Even as Banquo's ghost, haunted the kingly assassin, the usurper Macbeth; even as the grim shade startled him at the very banquet table, with the brimming goblet prepared to quaff the ruby wine, so the spirit of bis victim seemed ever present to him. He gazed upon the sightless sockets, once filled wi h light and thought, and seemed to hear the leath wa'l of the slaughtered sacrifice to his bloody, ambitious passions. Was it not terri-ble? There is an all seeing, an all righteous God, who has endowed us with a conscience which never sleeps." Nelson Bradford qualled as he listened, each word seemed burned into his heart, but he saw that an answer was expected and he respond

"The ways of the Almighty are wise and for the best, they are not for man to question."
"I am glad you think so, Nelson, I perfectly agree with you," and he turned away to join the Colonel.

Bradford remsided standing upon the spot Bradford remained standing upon the spot where Harry had left him, absorbed in his own reflections. His was a tall, alender, graceful form; his complexion was dark, and his hair black as jet, his eyes were also black, and placeing in expression; his zone very straight, what is generally styled Grecian, and his mouth of medium size, with lips thin and haughty. One might call him handsome, but at times there lurked in the eye, and upon the other features.

which he would do or die. His moral character was far from being good, though he managed, under a pleasing exterior and attable manners, to hide its deformities.

He was a person to be feared, for wee to the one who thwarted him-at some time or another he was sure to avenge himself; his associate had never particularly noticed his disposition, and indeed he rarely permitted his real nature to appear. Artful, designing, self-possessed, and extravagant, he had been wealthy, but had squandered his inheritance recklessly away; an only sen, the bulk of his father's property became his, and too indolent to add to it, and much given to pleasure and vain expenditure, he soon rid himself of all. In his earlier days he met Julia Harvey, the daughter of a Southern planter, who had lost his whole fortune in fruitless speculatious. He liked ber for her beauty, and for awhile paid her the most pointed attentions, but he had no intentions of marrying; he liked his liberly too well to lose it for one who could bring him no splendid dow-er; so after flirting desperately until he tired of her society, he deserted her for some new game. Julia had loved him. A true daughter of the South, with the fiery blood of Spain, on her mother's side, she was impulsive and passion and when she realized that he had forsaken he in a moment of frenzy, peculiar to her, she took an oath of vengeance.
